

It's not surprising that the two most frequent words are development and software because these principles are about developing software. A few other interesting qualities of this viewpoint stand out:

- The only adjective used more than once is effective.
- Requirements, developers, work, team, and process are all focal points.

If you start to think about how to measure agile teams, you should definitely think about how you're measuring the main focal points. If you start breaking these down into questions you can apply measurements to, you'll get something like the following:

- Are your development teams effective?
- Are your processes effective?
