request or else allow it with restrictions on the allowed headers and methods.

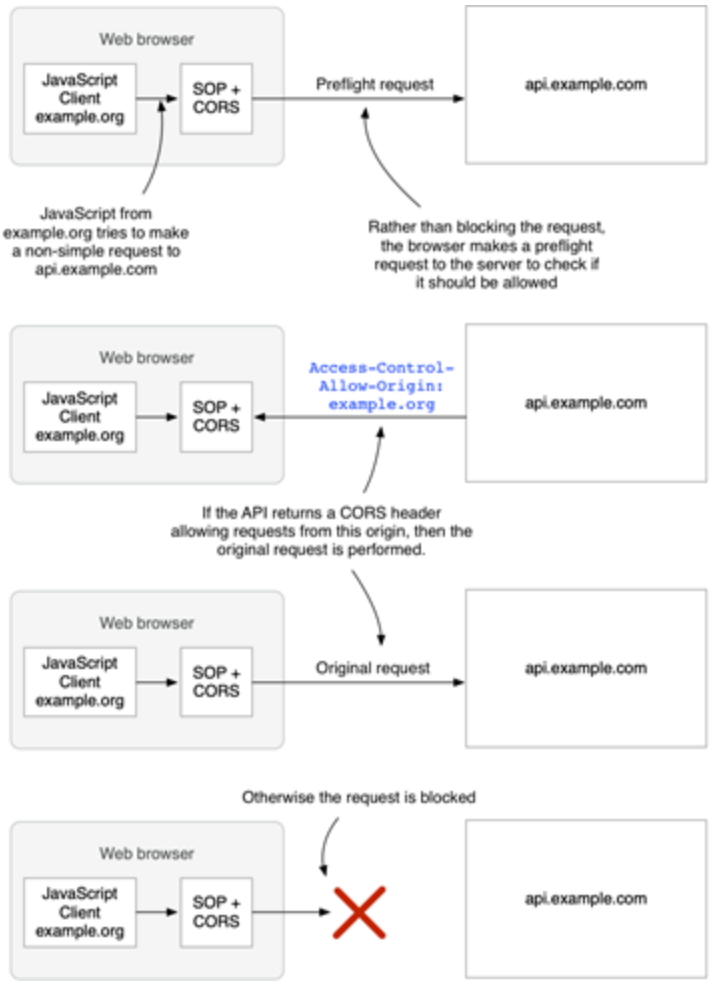

Figure 5.2 When a script tries to make a cross-origin request that would be blocked by the SOP, the browser now makes a CORS preflight request to the target server to ask if the request should be permitted. If the server agrees, and any conditions it specifies are satisfied, then the browser makes the original request and lets the script see the response. Otherwise, the browser blocks the request.