So, non-personalized recommendations, we were saying: you might ask what’s that about. Allow me take the longest route to explain this: personalized recommendations are targeted on individual customers, based on the data we have about them (past purchases, metadata that shows similarity with other users). But sometimes we don’t have this data at all, for instance when we start a new website, or even when we get a new customer about which we know nothing at all - that’s why many websites, like Twitter, Pinterest, Netflix or MovieLens asks you questions on sign-up, to understand your tastes and be able to provide some rough personalized recommendations based on users with similar profiles.
