

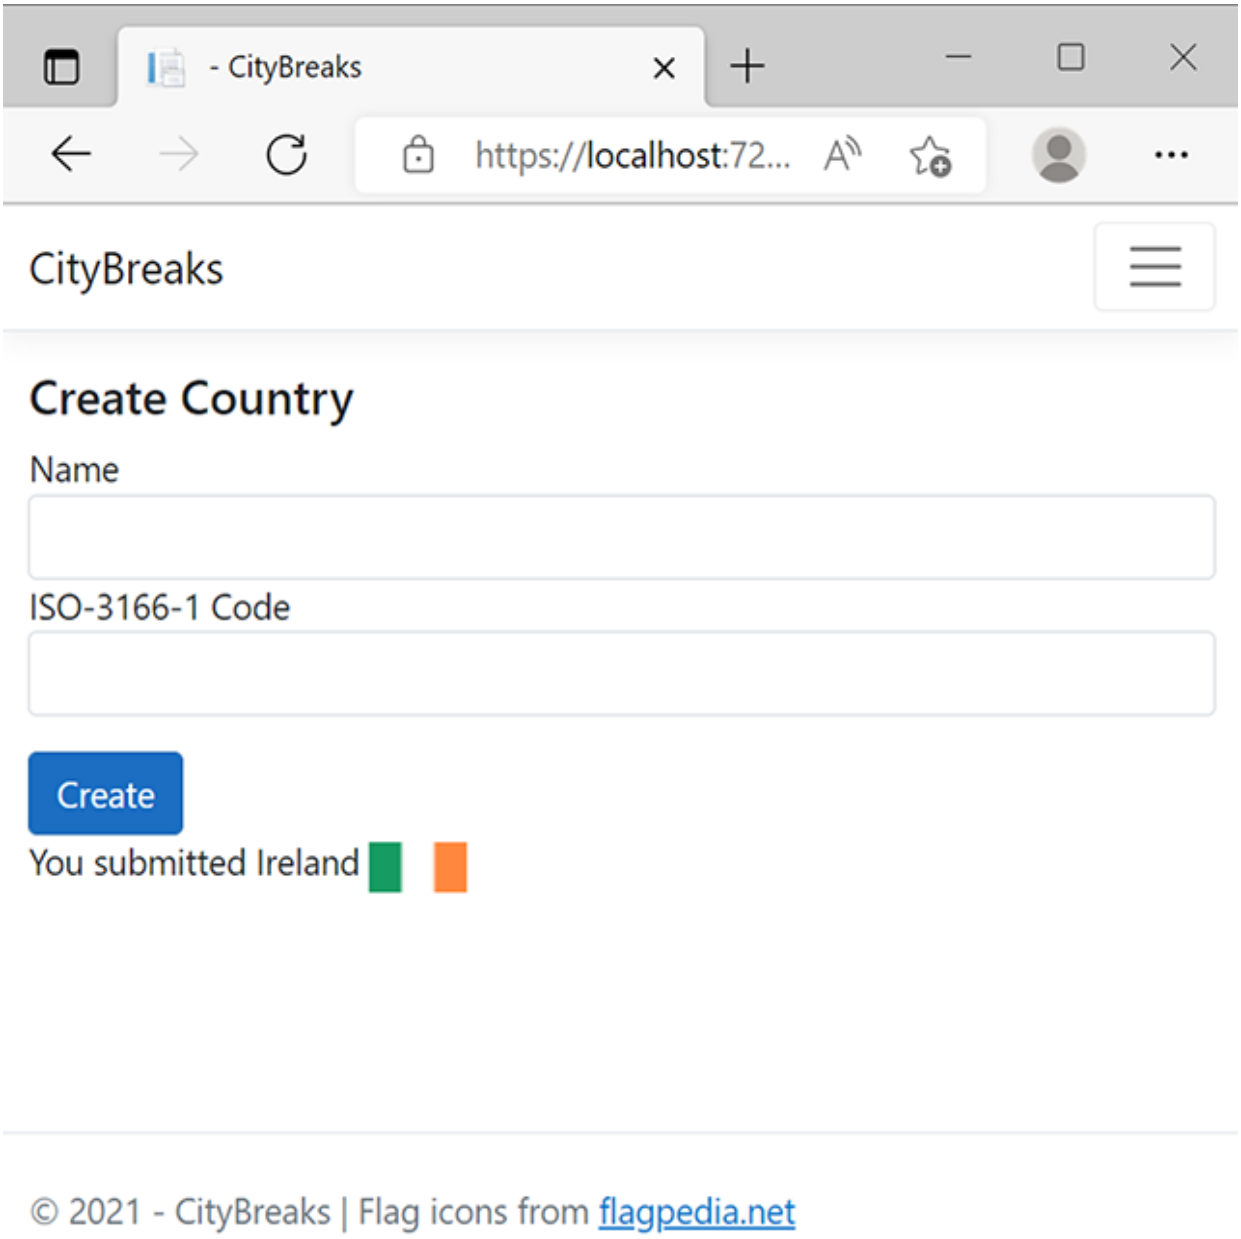

Figure 5.7 You use dot notation to construct form control names to ensure values are bound to complex objects.

You may be wondering why the input model is necessary when it is identical to the `Country` class in the Models folder. It is true at the moment that they are the same, but later in the book, the `Country` class will acquire new properties you don't want to expose to the model binder when a new instance is being created.